

And So They Were Married

START THIS STORY TODAY

THERE were a hundred questions that Ruth wanted to throw at the girl. She wanted to ask her who else belonged to the family, how she had happened to choose this neighborhood in which to live, and so forth, but instead she went into the kitchen selected her best aluminum pan, knocking down two more in her hurry, and went back to the door. She hoped the girl would say something more or would perhaps invite her to come over and do something, but she simply took the saucepan with a merry "thank you," and vanished inside the door opposite. Ruth was forced to curb her curiosity whether she wanted to or not.

The next morning, however, after she had kissed Scott good-by, and had had lunch to come back, when he did come back, five minutes after starting, for his raincoat, and she had kissed him again, and started him off, and she was beginning to take the things off the table, the bell rang. Ruth went to the door filled with expectancy, and discovered a good-looking man in the hall.

"I beg your pardon," he said politely, "but I wonder if you would mind going over to my wife. She isn't feeling very well, and I have to go out. Would it be too much trouble? I think she's over-tired with moving."

"Certainly, I'll be right over," Ruth returned and turning back to get her key and to turn down the gas flame on the stove, she hurried across the hall.

The apartment next door was similar in size to her own, but that it was a back apartment and looked out on an alley. The day was dreary outside, and it had begun to rain, but inside it looked cheerful enough, for there was a soft glow over everything. Thick rugs were thrown over the floors so closely that there was little of the floor showing. Ruth always hated the ugly oak floors with their varnished look; here they did not show. Ruth glanced into the kitchen as she passed, and saw that it was in wild disorder, but the rest of the house although not entirely to rights was picturesquely in disorder.

The plain apartment house wallpaper was almost covered with heavily embroidered hangings in blue and dull green and gold, and on a couch in the living-room lay the pretty girl who had come to the door last night. She wore a gorgeously embroidered Chinese coat and trousers and cunning Chinese slippers. She did not look tired, but her lovely hair which was hanging down her back, Ruth saw was more beautiful than ever. Most women when they unbind their hair never know what to do with it and they therefore braid it in ugly braids for the night. This woman's hair was not exactly curly, but it was bushy and stood out all around her like a halo. Ruth thought she had never seen anyone so lovely.

"Can I help you do anything?" she asked, sitting down on the edge of the couch. "I know how hard it is to get settled."

"Oh, no, I'll manage, but I did want someone to talk to. I hate rainy weather. Here, sit over in this chair, you'll be more comfortable. She was looking Ruth over as she spoke with bright sharp eyes. "That's the dearest little house-dress," she exclaimed, almost in the same breath. It sounded friendly and sweet, but it actually emphasized the difference between the two women. Ruth knew that she could be as attractive as this stranger in such a setting, but in a simple gingham dress she looked like a bourgeois housekeeper, while this woman in satin and embroidered looked like a beautiful bird of some rare kind. Her very manner of speaking of Ruth's simple attire emphasized this fact, although Ruth was too much interested in this new friend to believe that she had done it purposely.

"I suppose you thought I was crazy when you got my message. People don't ordinarily make friends like this, do they? Especially in New York."

"I suppose they don't in some places," Ruth assented laughingly, "but there aren't so many barriers in a 'walk up' place like this as there are in some of the more expensive apartments."

"I see," returned the girl, "I shall want lots of advice from you, where to go for supplies and so forth, all the little humdrum things that go to make up housekeeping. I hate it all."

Ruth was silent. She didn't like it herself, but she was too practical not to want to have things neat about her, therefore what there was to do she did.

"I can see when Dan doesn't get much to eat," the girl said lightly, "and my housekeeping will be rather skanky to say the least. I suppose you're very efficient now, and know the best cuts of meat and everything there is to know." Her tone was not sneering but there was a hint of malice in it.

"I didn't know a thing before I was married," Ruth returned quickly, and a little sharply. "But if the thing is there to do and there's no way of getting out of it unless you leave it undone, I do it."

"I know you're a wonder," sighed the girl, and even that implied that she was half making fun.

In the next installment, "Getting Acquainted with the Whitmores" is fascinating to Ruth and Scott.

You don't barricade the side-walk leading to your business house and you don't lock a main entrance to your commercial home. If you would either one, you would seriously discourage the coming of customers to you. But if you don't have a Keystone telephone you are in effect closing one of the chief avenues of connection between you and the public.

Keystone unlimited business telephones cost only about one cent an hour and you can use them as often as you like without extra charge.

Crepe Hats Wreathed With Flowers

Women who notice things have observed that there is a distinct vogue for fabric hats, generally of Georgette crepe or taffeta. Navy blue is the color most often asked for, since these hats are so attractive with the dark silk dresses of early Summer. But now, with warm weather, come the hats in lighter tints—white, pink, light blue and orchid. Wreaths of field flowers, roses and cherries encircle the crowns, and the brims are bound with ribbon.

Scores of fresh, delightful hats of this type are here at $3.75, $5 and $6.
(Market)

(Chestnut)

New Summer Frocks Arrive in an Airy Flutter

Soft Georgette crepes and voiles and, most summery of all, crisp organdie will set plans for jolly holidays buzzing in feminine heads.
An organdie frock that is frilly with little pleatings of net is one of the newcomers. It is sketched and is to be had in pink, lavender or white, with a moire ribbon girle to match. Note the reappearance of short sleeves. $18.
Another delightful organdie in white, navy or maize has a wide shawl collar trimmed with a band of tucking to match the trimming of the collar and sleeves. $10.50.
Black and White Voile
that will appeal to elderly women is used in a new dress that shows bandings of black silk. The voile is black and is thickly scattered with small white dots. The collar is of fine embroidered organdie. $12.
Of Hindu and Georgette Crepe
The Georgette crepe is a youthful dress and is sketched. The long tunic and soft, flowing sleeves, as well as the bodice are embroidered with heavy silk. In flesh, white and navy at $18.50.
The frock of Hindu crepe is in navy or black with irregular designs in white. Plain color taffeta trims the bodice and forms the girle and the cuffs. $16.50.
New Navy Taffeta Dresses at $15 and $16.50
Soutache braid makes its appearance on the wide panel in the front of this frock. The sleeves are of Georgette and there is a little tucked vester of ecru crepe. $15.
The other taffeta frock has an overbodice that is embroidered all over in silk and the sleeves are of plain Georgette. $16.50.
Hundreds of other Summer dresses are of voiles, gingham, organdies, nets, silks and Georgette crepes in all the charming freshness of the summer season. The prices are quite moderate in every instance.
(Market)
